The CSS selector that was most useful for this assignment was the class selector.

The class selector allowed me to choose how I wanted each title, and just general paragraph words to be formatted consistently without rewriting the same rules over and over. The difference between margin and padding is that padding is the space inside each border and margin is the space outside of each border. The box model affected my design in a good way.

I used it for my list, as well as my resources page and it made the page more fun to look at and really highlighted it as I intended.

I did have a situation where one Css rule overrode another.

My a selector set all the links to blueviolet, but my "".websites a" and "".footer a" overrided it initially.

The CSS rule that most changed my overall webpage is the box element because it helped to highlight certain sections of my webpage.
